USS Turner Joy received a total of nine battle stars.

On April 11th, she put to sea once again to conduct a midshipman training cruise, during which she visited Pearl Harbor, California, and San Francisco. Later that summer, she again visited Seattle in conjunction with that city's annual Seafair festivities. The Turner Joy returned to Long Beach in October, 1964, two months to the day since she had rushed to the aid of the USS Maddox. The destroyer conducted normal operations out of Long Beach until December 18th when she entered the naval shipyard for a three-month overhaul. In July, 1965 she departed Long Beach with Destroyer Squadron 19, Maddox. The destroyer conducted normal operations out of Long Beach until December 18th when she entered the naval shipyard for a three-month overhaul.

In the early morning hours of August 2nd, Maddox (DD 731) engaged in a similar exchange with North Vietnamese gunners. The USS Turner Joy received a total of nine battle stars.

On March 13th, 1964, Turner Joy departed Long Beach for her midshipman training cruise. The destroyer conducted normal operations out of Long Beach until December 18th when she entered the naval shipyard for a three-month overhaul.

On March 13th, 1964, Turner Joy departed Long Beach for her midshipman training cruise. The destroyer conducted normal operations out of Long Beach until December 18th when she entered the naval shipyard for a three-month overhaul.

On March 13th, 1964, Turner Joy departed Long Beach for her midshipman training cruise. The destroyer conducted normal operations out of Long Beach until December 18th when she entered the naval shipyard for a three-month overhaul.